A writer tells his last story, that of the tragic life of Klara Werner, as he tries to understand what happened to her during the final days of WWII.

Every time he has finished a new book and worried what to write next, it was to be about Klara. With one tale spun out and the next not yet begun, hers was always the ace in the hole as he stared at the blank page. He believed a good writer writes to find his narrative. But he also suspected that every writer has such a chronicle, which he can produce when his muse fails him. And then it may have been that Klara was his muse, and after telling her story there would be nothing left to write. Perhaps this is why he saved Klara's account till the end of her life. And the end of his.

What was the truth about Klara and the men in her life?
